MICHIGAN'S SYSTEM OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Introduction

The state of Michigan has a substantial number of local governments. In 2007, it was estimated that the state had more than 1,800 units of local government and more than 800 school districts, charter schools, and intermediate school districts. The number of units of local government is considerably higher in Michigan than most other states.

Local government units include counties, townships, cities, villages, school districts, intermediate school districts, planning and development regions, and special districts and authorities. For the most part, the creating of local units of government is the result of local initiative rather than state action. Some local governments predate the formation of the state of Michigan itself. Several counties, townships, and a few cities were first organized on the authority of the territorial government and the Northwest Ordinance. However, most local units came into being after Michigan was admitted to the Union in 1837 on the basis of permissive legislation — that is, citizens petitioned Lansing for the right to organize under one statute or another. In the case of cities, formal organization came about by action of the state legislature.

There is no overall state plan as to how the system of local governments should be arranged. Rather than impose a preconceived structure, the state has chosen a flexible, incremental approach. In general, it permits people in local areas to decide what form of local government they want based on the concerns and needs of the area.

The Michigan Approach

The Michigan approach to creating local governments is based on the premises that the state requires a comprehensive system of governments through which it could extend its authority to all parts of the state and that rural areas would need less local government than urban areas.

The county-township system fulfilled the requirements of the first premise. Townships resulted from the imagination of Thomas Jefferson when he sponsored, as part of the Northwest Ordinance enacted by the Continental Congress, the provision that the Northwest Territory (now Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota) should be surveyed into six- by six-square-mile areas. He wanted local government in the territory to be patterned after the town meeting system of New England. Each of these surveyed areas, he said, could become an “elementary republic.” When the settlers from the East came to Michigan, they began organizing them as township governments — governments for rural areas that would eventually blanket the entire state.

The county system of government was imported from England but modified by individual states to fit their needs and circumstances. Michigan borrowed and adapted the New York model. The counties became an overlay of governments through which the state could effectively manage the vast territory. Having a system of such outposts was essential during a time when transportation was laborious and communications slow. Prior to 1968, township supervisors were members of the county board of supervisors. However, as an outgrowth of the one-person, one-vote decisions of the 1960s, the state legislature created the county commissioner system of county representation in 1968. Under this plan, commissioners are directly elected from districts within the county. Their ties to the townships and cities are considerably less than they were under the supervisor system.

Through these two forms of local government, Michigan had a two-tiered network of government. State officials had their counterpart officers at the county and township levels through which state laws could be enforced, birth and death records maintained, roads built, land records recorded, taxes collected, and the like. This two-tiered system turned out to be one which could meet the governing needs of rural areas as well.

These governments, though, were not adequate for urban settlements where people needed more local services. The more complex set of interdependent relationships inherent in an urban setting also required a government with stronger regulatory powers. The state legislature provided for the establishment of city governments for these urban settlements, and gave them the authority to provide a wide range of services and regulate the behavior and conduct of people and organizations — an authority that townships and counties did not possess. The cities were separated from the township governments and also were required to administer the laws and rules just as townships were. Throughout the 19th century, the legislature chartered each city by passing a special act. Beginning in 1909, cities were granted home rule, a grant of authority that permitted cities to draft and adopt their own charters by vote of the people.

Villages are an intermediate level of government. They have most of the special powers of cities but not the duties the state demands. A village is a kind of super-special district within a township because villages remain part of the townships in which they are located. Villages, like cities, have home rule status, although the state legislature also enacted village charters until 1895, the year it passed the General Law Village Act.

The Michigan approach included two processes for adjusting boundaries to expanding settlements. Township territories could be annexed to adjacent cities with voter approval in the involved units. Many of the cities such as Detroit, Grand Rapids, Flint, and others, when first incorporated, included only one or two square miles of area. They expanded through the mechanism of annexation. Eventually, annexation would cause bitter relations between a city and its neighboring townships.

Consolidation is the second process and is intended to accommodate governmental merger of units that have merged socially and economically, but not politically. This process has been used infrequently.

While most of the statutory elements of this Michigan approach are still in effect, in many ways the plan itself has broken down. There are several reasons. A major one has been the gradual expansion of township powers. Townships now have the authority to provide more services and adopt ordinances to regulate undesired conduct. Having this authority has enabled townships to serve developing areas more effectively and stave off annexation until they could qualify for city incorporation themselves.

Perhaps more important was the establishment of a state boundary commission that exercised state superintending control over the incorporation of new cities and annexation of township territory to cities. Rather than leaving issues of incorporation and annexation to be resolved by raw power politics between neighboring communities, the commission oversees a boundary adjustment process that is more analytical than political. Annexation still has an embittering effect on inter-community relations, but it no longer is marked by open warfare. Quieting the politics over local boundaries also has enabled townships to develop and expand under the township form of government. Township populations now range from a dozen or so residents to more than 90,000.

The Contemporary Reality

In brief, at the community level, cities, villages, and townships exercise the primary governing authority. The three units have similar, but not identical, service and regulatory powers. The major differences are that townships still do not have full territorial integrity or control over the road system; they also have limited general taxing power and only limited flexibility in structuring the government. Villages differ from cities in that villages are not legally separated from the township and are not required to assess property for tax purposes or conduct state and national elections. Unlike cities, neither townships nor villages are empowered to levy a personal income tax.

County government, too, has undergone some change from those earlier days. The change, though, has been more in detail than in role. That is, county government, in many ways, still exists to extend the outreach of state government and serve state interests. Moreover, this role is perhaps being strengthened. For example, counties are partners with the state in state programs such as public health, mental health, courts, vital records, land and property records, disaster preparedness, solid waste management, highway and road administration and maintenance, property tax administration, law enforcement, elections administration, and incarceration of convicts. In areas such as elections administration and jails management, the role of counties is being expanded. In a few service areas — welfare for example — the state has assumed full responsibility. In some program areas, counties have formed partnerships with other units to organize and deliver services.

Counties are also a kind of local government in that they conduct some services that are local, rather than state, in orientation. Parks and recreation programs, senior citizen services, medical care (nursing home) facilities, hospital and ambulance services, county highway patrols, public transportation, libraries, drainage systems, and water and sewer facilities are some examples of programs in which counties are engaged for local, rather than state, reasons. In many instances, counties operate these programs in partnership with cities, villages, and townships.

Despite the many services provided by these general purpose governments, other needs arise that fall outside their jurisdiction. To address some of these needs, local officials and citizens establish special districts or authorities. In some cases, a community government may establish a special district pursuant to general statutes; in other cases, the state legislature may adopt a law customized to fit a particular situation. Formation of the special district is then subject to voter approval. Special districts are often attractive for several reasons. One is that voters can be reasonably assured that a particular problem will be addressed, often financed by user fees rather than general property taxation. Another is that special districts provide a degree of flexibility in forming service jurisdictions that address areas of need or want for the particular service. Moreover, they provide a means of crossing municipal boundaries without threatening the integrity of the general purpose units.

To assist officials in these numerous governmental units in gaining a wider perspective, the state established a network of planning and development regions. By action of the governments within each of the regions, each region was given an organizational structure. These units do not provide services to citizens. Rather, they conduct studies on various governmental functions, such as transportation and water resources management. Findings from the studies, then, are intended for use by decision makers in counties, cities, townships, and villages.

State-Local Relations

State government now assumes a greater superintending role over the local governments than in times past. Supervision of the boundary commission, already discussed, is one example. Other instances include general statutes setting rules, for example, on open meetings, free access to records and documents, uniform budget and accounting procedures including financial audits, annual financial reports, and assignment of emergency managers in units that are unable to extricate themselves from persistent indebtedness. The courts may establish other rules in areas of employment practices, discrimination, or zoning, to cite a few illustrations.

In addition, various state agencies have partnership programs with local units. State agencies, such as the departments of transportation, community health, and human services, exercise a significant supervisory role with respect to the planning, conduct, and reporting of the particular programs.

State financial aid forms another cornerstone in the relationship of the state to local governments. Property taxes and fees for services constitute the main source of locally raised funds in most units, but state aid substantially supplements local financing. Some state aid, such as that from the sales tax, is mandated by the constitution or state statute and deposited to the local units General Fund. Other assistance — such as that for schools, roads, mental health, public health, libraries, and cultural facilities — is restricted to the purpose for which it is granted.

MICHIGAN COUNTIES

NOTE: Michigan has 83 counties. According to the 2010 federal decennial census, they range in population from 2,156 persons in Keweenaw County in the Upper Peninsula to Wayne County's 1,820,584 persons (approximately 40% of whom reside in the city of Detroit) in the southeastern part of the state.

<sup>4</sup> 2006 PA 534 eliminated the requirement for minimum number of school days, utilizing total hours of instruction instead.
