House Bill 4288 (H-1) amends Sec. 5111 of the Public Health Code to provide statutory authority for certain local health or animal control officials to order the euthanization of an animal in a case of human exposure to an animal that could be infected with rabies. The bill establishes criteria and consultation requirements before such an order may be issued. The bill does not apply to livestock.

The bill is permissive and will not have any direct state fiscal impact. A local health department may incur an increase in costs if this statutory change prompts an increase in the number of ordered euthanizations and medical tests for rabies of the affected animals. Current administrative rules are not in conflict with this bill, so it is possible that the number of ordered euthanizations will not be significantly affected by this bill.
