Responsible forest management helps provide jobs and maintain these important resources to help meet the daily needs of Michiganders and people around the world; and

Whereas, Every forested acre represents an opportunity to protect habitats and communities; to explore nature; to provide clean air and water; and to produce raw materials like timber, fiber, and biomass; and

Whereas, Sustainable forest management requires strong cooperation among private citizens, government agencies, and the forestry industry. More than 60 percent of our state's forestlands belong to private landowners. The federal and state governments own 40 percent; and

Whereas, Working in partnership, government, industry, and private citizens are making progress in the vital task of preserving the health of Michigan's forests and woodlands while providing essential products to the American people. All three groups must work together to ensure the sustainable development of our forests and woodlands; now, therefore, be it
