SUMMARY:

Senate Bill 539 would amend the landlord-tenant act to allow landlords to return the amount owed from a security deposit electronically to a tenant instead of by check or money order.

Rental leases often require tenants to pay a security deposit at the start of the lease to cover any potential damage to the rental unit, apart from normal wear and tear, that occurs during their tenancy.¹ The act allows a landlord to deduct the amount of damages to a rental unit, including the estimated cost of repairs, from a tenant's security deposit as long as the landlord mails the tenant, within 30 days after the termination of occupancy, an itemized list of the damages and a check or money order for the remaining balance. (However, this notice requirement does not apply if the tenant does not give the landlord a forwarding address within four days after their occupancy ends.)

Senate Bill 539 would allow a landlord to transmit the owed amount to the tenant through direct deposit, electronic transfer, or the use of an internet or mobile payment account or app instead of by check or money order. The landlord would still have to mail the tenant a notice and itemized list of deducted damages within 30 days after the end of occupancy. A landlord that returns a security deposit electronically would have to deposit the returned amount into the tenant's account in a financial institution or an internet or mobile payment account or app within 10 days after they put the notice of damages in the mail.

MCL 559.609

FISCAL IMPACT:

The bill would have no fiscal impact on the state or local units of government.
