He was named head coach of the Chippewa Valley Big Reds football team in 2009, and he earned accolades and guided his team to success. During his time with the Big Reds football program, he led the team to achieve the 2018 Division 1 State Championship, three MAC Red championships, four district championships, and a regional championship. As a testament to his abilities, his final record includes 104 gameday wins, and the Big Reds have not missed a playoff since 2011.

Beyond the football field, Scott has made a positive difference in metro Detroit and Michigan by raising money to fund cancer research through the Van Andel Institute and to support our veterans through the Wounded Warrior Project. Statements

Senators Polehanki, Albert, Bayer and Irwin asked and were granted unanimous consent to make statements and moved that the statements be printed in the Journal.

The motion prevailed.

Senator Polehanki's statement is as follows:

Madam President, just yesterday a Republican State Representative in the Michigan House held a press conference and announced a resolution to censure Michigan's first Black Speaker for being racist because the Speaker supported minority-owned small business funding in last year's budget. The Republican Representative compared this to the Jim Crow-era whites-only drinking fountains. It was disgusting and that's why I have risen to speak today.

Madam President, this isn't the first time that my Republican colleagues have tried to pervert the meaning of racism to confuse and feed their base. A Republican colleague in this chamber has written on social media that Democrats are vile scumbags who are the party of racism. They say we're racist, Madam President, because we acknowledge race in some of our caucuses, our policies, and our budgets. In the Michigan Legislature, Democrats have a Latino caucus, a Black caucus, an Asian Pacific American caucus. We made Juneteenth a holiday and, yes, we created a grant opportunity for minority-owned business owners and will continue to do so until racism in America is over. We made progress as a country but we're not there yet. You see, my Republican colleagues know that in order to claim that Democrats are the real racists, they have to pretend that racism is over. They'd say racism is over, so we don't need a critical theory on race. They'd say racism is over, so we don't need education on diversity, equity, and inclusion. They'd say racism is over, so we don't need to give minority-owned business owners a leg up in the budget.

Madam President, racism isn't over. We have at least one Republican governor trying to rewrite some hard truths about American history and turn it all into happy history. We have a now-former Republican presidential candidate afraid to say the Civil War was fought over slavery because it would tank her poll numbers. We have 81 percent of Republican primary voters saying in a poll they agree with Trump that immigrants are—quote—poisoning the blood of our country. We have American Nazis marching in Nashville and we have a Republican member of the Michigan House amplifying the white supremacist great replacement theory which played a part in the mass murder of ten Black Americans who were trying to go grocery shopping. Why don't these legislators ask Americans of color if racism is over? I think they'll tell you.

Madam President, Democrats still see and acknowledge race because the United States of America is not yet post-racial. That's why we can't do color-blind politics in America right now. That's why learning about diversity, equity, and inclusion practices; having meaningful discussions about systemic racism; and creating equitable budgets are still needed, and that's why we do what we do. Democrats believe in a more perfect union, but we can't kid ourselves that racism no longer exists. We've got more work to do as a country and that work will happen in our classrooms, our boardrooms, our lecture halls, and right here in the Michigan State Capitol.

Senator Albert's statement is as follows:

I have a very important and time-sensitive proposal to discuss today. The clock is literally ticking here. Of course, it's early March so this pressing issue could be none other than the rapidly-approaching time change. In case you missed it, daylight saving time begins this weekend.

This week I introduced Senate Bill No. 770, which would place on the November ballot the question of staying on standard time or springing ahead for daylight saving time. Before introducing this bill, I spent some time looking at the genesis of daylight saving time in researching whether or not the time change has been successful in accomplishing anything. In 1918, daylight saving time was adopted through the Standard Time Act. This bill was enacted primarily because Germany had undertaken a similar measure supposing it would save energy. This was not a proven hypothesis. Once the war ended, it became clear Americans wanted to get back to standard time, twice. Congress sent President Woodrow Wilson a bill to repeal daylight saving time, and twice he vetoed it. A second time, the repeal became law through a congressional override and national daylight saving time ended. Clearly, even from the beginning daylight saving time was a contentious issue.

For the next 23 years, the federal government stayed out of the time-change business, but that ended in early 1942. Then-President Franklin Roosevelt implemented what he coined “War Time,” which was a permanent, year-round daylight saving time. Again, Americans were dissatisfied with this policy and “War Time” was repealed shortly after the conclusion of World War II in 1945.

Finally in 1966, the Uniform Time Act was signed into law and it established a national daylight saving time, but it did reserve the ability for individual states to exempt themselves. It is worth noting, in January 1974, during the energy crisis, a permanent daylight saving time was again implemented in what originally seemed to be a popular move. However, in short order the American public quickly turned sour to the change. It was just too dark for too long in the morning. By the end of the year, the initiative was scrapped. In the fall, Americans started turning their clocks back to standard time. Once the Uniform Time Act was in place, the state of Michigan put this issue up to a vote of the people both in 1968 and 1972. Both votes were relatively close margins. At first daylight saving time was rejected, but it subsequently passed.

Throughout history, the primary justification of supporting daylight saving time has been to save energy. Well, what does the evidence show? How much energy are we saving? Good luck finding a definitive answer to that question, at best you will find mixed results. Some will show energy savings but will have all sorts of caveats, other research shows results that are inclusive or contradictory. Energy savings aside, we also need to factor other consideration on how this policy impacts our daily lives. A University of Michigan study from 2014 found a 24 percent jump in the number of heart attacks on the Monday after the spring forward for daylight saving time. Loss of sleep and an interruption of the body’s natural rhythm may be to blame. Other experts have written about negative health effects for teens facing sleep deprivation worsened by the spring time change. And the list could go on.

So now here we are. It’s over 100 years since we first adopted daylight saving time, and we find ourselves asking the question, Why are we doing this? I for one cannot find a valid reason, and I’ve seen the time change both ways. When I was deployed to Iraq, I experienced what it was like to remain on standard time while everyone else back home changed their clocks. I was fascinated to learn that keeping the clocks constant did not result in the world coming to an end, an annoying disruption was removed, and it became apparent that remaining on standard time was more practical and reasonable. But no matter your feelings, daylight saving time is an issue that affects every Michigander in some way. After 52 years, it’s time to bring this issue back to a vote to the people of Michigan. I know how I would vote.

Senator Bayer’s statement is as follows:

I rise today in recognition of International Women’s Day. March 8 is a globally-recognized day on which we uplift women, celebrate accomplishments, and put a spotlight on some of the issues faced by women around the world. The theme for this year is, “Invest in women: Accelerate progress.” We know that investing in women is vital to creating and maintaining a thriving economy and society. We’ve seen throughout history what happens when you invest in women.

Women make up an enormous part of our workforce. We are small business owners, CEOs, farmers, caregivers, engineers, elected officials, and so much more. My own company was built with the help of many people and organizations who invested in me, including our own MEDC. With that investment, we were able to reach many more customers, build up our business, grew our impact through the work of our customers—schools, mental health providers, family service agencies, and more. Over the last 100 years, women have entered the workforce in record numbers. We continue to climb the ladder, break that glass ceiling, bring home the bacon, and every other cliché, and our economy and our society are better for it.

But there is much work still to be done. Around the world, women are still disproportionately affected by poverty, face discrimination in the workforce, and are at risk for exploitation. In fact, according to the UN, if the current trends continue more than 342 million women and girls will be living in extreme poverty by 2030. This is unacceptable, and it is avoidable. Sadly we also know that women face much more than poverty. There are global conflicts currently devastating communities, human rights violations, threats of violence, and a list that goes on and on. This is why we must continue to fight for women and invest in women—and women entrepreneurs.

I’m proud of the steps we’ve taken in the last year right here in Michigan to invest in women, from defending bodily autonomy, protecting our LGBTQ+ community, expanding the earned income tax credit, we are stepping up to do more for women in our state and continue to show up each and every day here for Michigan’s women. I hope you’ll join me in celebrating International Women’s Day and, my colleagues, let’s be proud of what we’ve done and be ready to do more.

Senator Irwin’s statement is as follows:

I wanted to take this rare and special opportunity to rise and agree wholeheartedly with my colleague from the 18th District. Daylight saving time is an anachronistic and damaging policy that was once upon a time developed to save energy, but at this time it probably wastes a little bit of energy. It doesn’t just waste a little bit of energy and fail to meet its original objectives, it also causes car accidents, workplace accidents, and it also causes an unnecessary level of crankiness that none of us like to deal with, especially when you have small children. That’s why people with small children and farmers have always been against this, because of course the cows and the little people don’t know what time we’re pretending it is today when it’s different than the time we were pretending it was yesterday. So it’s all very silly. I agree we should change it.

I did want to remark though that one of the things that has been a struggle for us in changing this for many, many years is that there are different types of people in this world. Maybe because I waited tables for so long, I’ve always been sort of a night person. So I’ve always liked sticking with daylight saving time. Let’s stick with the summer schedule. We get our evening restaurant opportunities, maybe enjoy a concert, the golf industry certainly loves it, and much more time to enjoy the beautiful outdoors here in Michigan in the evenings. Other people though, including all of our sleep scientists, feel strongly that we need to be on standard time. And I’ll tell you what I feel strongly about, I feel strongly that those of us who are arguing about permanent standard and permanent daylight time are preventing the progress we need to overcome those folks who want to stick with this silly clock setting dance that we do twice a year.
